Maths Problem Solving:

Probability and graphing with Lego. I put 5 bricks of each of 6 colours in a bag and drew out 12 bricks (I used different bricks to make the graph so the odds didn't change). The odds of me drawing 2 of each colour were 1 in 6 and the closest I got to this was my second go.

Photos of my results.

Seaweed the Sea Dragon and the Rubbish Mountain continued

.....An Octopus, that was what was going on! Seaweed watched as all eight legs and arms sifted through his mountain of rubbish scattering it hither and thither! "Hey!, what are you doing?" called Seaweed to the very busy octopus. "Are you helping or hindering?", "Is this your treasure?" said the octopus, bumping into Seaweed. "It is", answered Seaweed "but not treasure, its rubbish!"

"Not all of it", said octopus. "Some of it is treasure too. I collect all things shiny to decorate my garden. This is a treasure trove to me and my most favourite place to come to at night time".

Seaweed couldn't believe that anything he had collected could be 'treasure'; after all it had been discarded, no longer useful to the yachties and picnickers! The octopus bumped and elbowed about until he had quite a stash. "What's your name Octopus?" asked Seaweed. "I'm Mister Elbows" he answered, "cause I do take up a lot of room with all these tentacles BUT they do come in handy when I am collecting and tidying".

Immediately Seaweed had a great idea. "Mr Elbows we could help each other! Let's gather all the rubbish from the sea and the beach together. I need help and you can take all the treasure you want for your garden." "Yes, yes" said Mr. Elbows. Seaweed knew that with Mr. Elbows help he would be able to collect even more rubbish from the sea, he just couldn't bear to see it floating about, so messy and untidy AND dangerous for the environment. Better still he would make a new friend!

In all his joy at having a new friend Seaweed forgot that, with two of them collecting, his rubbish pile would be even bigger and worse, and still didn't know what he was going to do with it all! That evening as Seaweed sat on his beach outside his home thinking how lucky he was to have a new friend he saw Starry his starfish pal drifting towards him, her pretty pink and peach star shape floating gently towards the beach just beside his 'tootsies'. But she wasn't so happy; in fact she was very agitated and upset. "Seaweed help, be quick....."
